THE

T R I A L 5/5: k.18

OF

EDWARDELY,

FOR THE MURDER OF

CHARLES BIGNELL,

INTHE

KINGDOM OF SWEDEN;

LIEUTENANT of the WORCESTER, Captain BOYLE,

One of the FLEET in the BALTIC,

Under the Command of Sir JOHN NORRIS, in the YEAR 1720,

WITH THE

Particular CIRCUMSTANCES which Occasioned his DEATH,

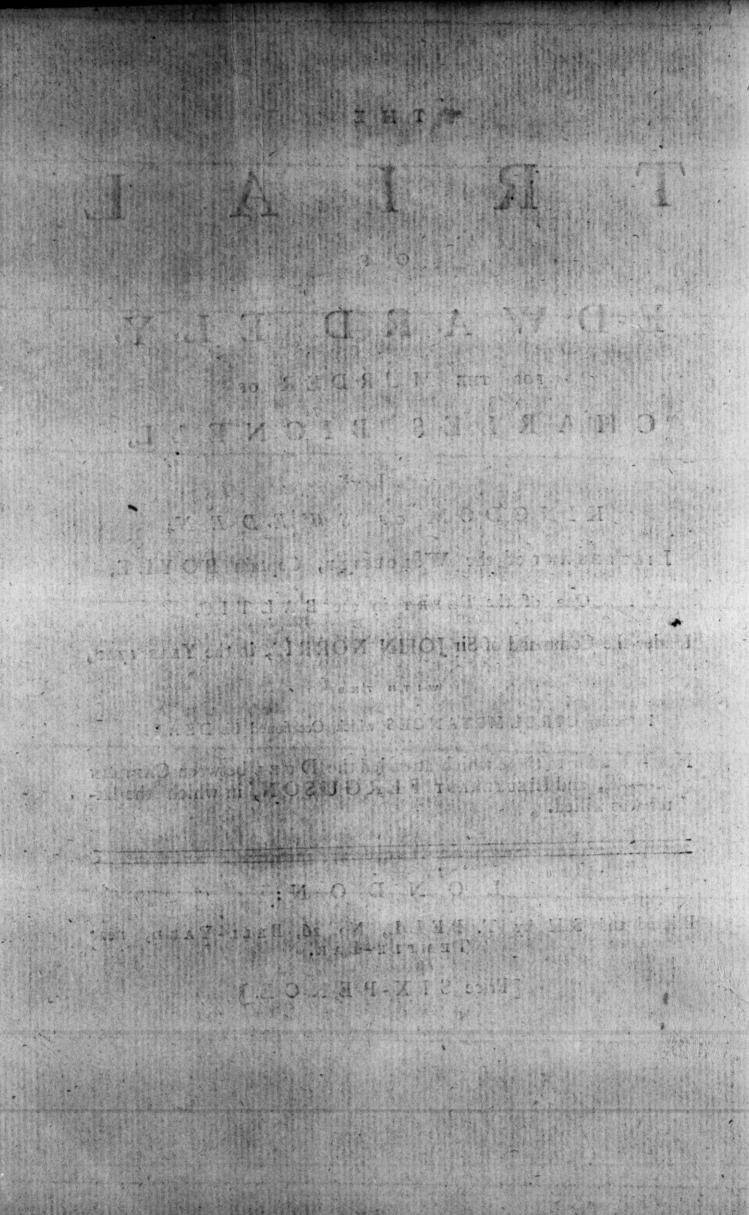

Nearly fimilar to those which attended the DUEL between CAPTAIN R--E, and LIEUTENANT FERGUSON, in which the latter was killed.

LONDON:

Printed and Sold by T. BELL, No. 26, Bell-Yard, near TEMPLE-BAR.

ther by troubling and the about the constitution of the constituti

[Price SIX-PEN.CE.]

INTRODUCTION.

THE similarity of the circumstances which occasioned the death of Charles Bignell, with those which attended the dispute and duel between captain R * * * and lieutenant Ferguson, and which proved so fatal to the latter, is the chief inducement for the publication of the solution of the following trial; the more especially as it is not generally known, and may serve to elucidate to the public some particular matters.

But prior to the trial, we shall beg leave to say a few words on the present common and fashionable mode of dueling; a practice, the pen cannot be too much employed against; nor can the laws be too strongly exerted to chastise the offenders.

First, then, let us examine into the principal cause of this absurd and wicked practice, which will be found no other than a salse and mistaken notion of honour, urging particular men to commit desperate actions, for little personal gratifica-tions, and mean, narrow, felfish views.

It has been judiciously observed, that false honour has been productive of more mischief to mankind, than ever real honour did good; as it affords the rash and malicious man a cloak to gratify a revengeful disposition, under the mask of honour. Thus the choleric bully, who catches fire at the least unguarded word of his companion, and, perhaps, jealoufly mistakes the meaning, deems himself injured, and without hefitation challenges a person, who possibly had no intention of giving an affront, nor any defign to engage in a quarrel; and, according to the nice rules of false honour, is obliged to rifque his life to the humour of a petulent coxcomb, or else be stigmatized with the appellation of a coward: for it is confidered as a mark of true honour, that you must defend yourself with your sword, against one who has been the aggressor, and done you an injury. Thus the person who has given the affront, or has harmed you, very honourally gives you fatisfaction, by taking away your life. This is esteemed to be a sufficient recompence, though not in the least confistent with justice, or common sense.

Of the absurdity of this too general opinion of honour, and the abuse of it, these mistaken heroes would be perfectly convinced, by duly weighing matters, before they entered upon them. By this prudential method, they would be taught, that by resisting the salse idea of honour, and abiding by the

INTRODUCTION.

frictly co-incide with a good conscience, a good heart, and good actions, is irrational, unjust, and vicious; and that to attempt to vindicate one crime by the committing of another still worse, is neither consonant with true honour, nor sound judgment.

It is greatly to be regretted, that one principal reason of dueling being so much in vogue, is, from the example of those whose duty it is to enact salutary laws; the vicious examples of the great, soon spreads their venom among those beneath them; and the best laws will never be regarded by the people, while a breach of them is continually made, and openly encouraged by their fuperiors.

We shall add a few words more on this abandoned taste, and view the parent of a family engaged in this nice contest, rather than give way to the dictates of reason; and with a mind superior to the ridiculous notions of the mistaken part of mankind, laugh and contemn their idle farcasms: and although the call of nature likewise, the anxiety of his partner, the cries of his offspring, and all the tender ties of blood, not to mention the chief point, (and which in this enlightened age is so little regarded) what religion denies, imprudently throws away a life, to gratify the revengeful disposition of a ferocious wretch, who may think his honour attacked and his character aspersed.

In short, we shall conclude our Introduction with the definition and distinction of true and salse honour, as laid down by a very learned man. "True honour (he says) is an attachment to honest and beneficent principles and a good reputation; and prompts a man to do good to others, and indeed to all men, at his own cost, pains, or peril. False honour is a pretence to this character, and does things to destroy it: and the abuse of honour is called honour, by those who from that good word borrow credit to act basely, rashly,

We fear we have trespassed too long on the readers patience; but, if this attempt to point out to the world, the dangerous effects that may ensue from a false and mistaken notion of honour, should have any weight, and prevent any one from pursuing the present mode of duelling, we shall not think the new employed in vain not think the pen employed in vain.

or foolishly."

n's allest of a confidence in the feet of Elyand inclination a factor countries, from-

TRIAL

O F

e get of suction sacists, on the agent of Segmenten

EDWARDELY, &c.

Committee against a week into the calling, and was historical by the december which the light decempants Mar. Consens the furgicial and the reference who was furgicially fight mape.

In July, 1720, the grand jury, at the fessions then held at Justice-Hall in the Old-Baily, found a bill of indictment against Edward Ely, for the murder of lieutenant Charles Bignell, in the kingdom of Sweden, and a special commission was issued for his trial; but upon an affidavit, that several material witnesses in that case were then on board the fleet in the Baltick, under the command of Sir John Norris, the said commission and trial were adjourned till the next fessions, and afterwards to the sessions in De-

Edward Ely was indicted by a special commission, pursuant to the statute of 39 Hen. 8. for the murder of Charles Bignell, in a certain island near the Dablers, in the kingdom of Sweden, by giving him, with a drawn sword, one mortal wound in the upper part of his breast above the left pap, of the length of half an inch, and the depth of twelve inches, on the 27th of September 1719, of which he instantly died.

Clement Courland. I am master of his majesty's ship the Worcester.——And about eight o'clock on Friday night, September 25th, I went into my cabbin, and was followed by the deceased, who was the first lieutenant; Mr. Cannon the surgeon, and the prisoner, who was surgeon's first mate. The prisoner then said to the deceased, "I have been on "board the Desiance, and got the papers drawn out, and "now I desire you to sign them."—These papers were for a sale to the prisoner, of the deceased's share of a prize taken by the Desiance, on the coast of Scotland.——The deceased asked him, if another time would not do as well; to which the prisoner answered, no—"I will no longer "be made a property of." The deceased replied, "I do " not refuse to sign them, but I won't be huffed into it; " and fince you are so peremptory, I defire you to take "your things out of my cabbin; I have permitted you to " lie there for fome time, but now you shall find another " lodging." Next morning, I heard feveral abusive words pass between them upon the quarter-deck, till at last the deceased ordered the prisoner to go off, which he did; but in a quarter of an hour he came up again, pulled off his hat, and told the deceased, that he had leave from captain Boyle, (the commander of the Worcester) to walk the quarter-deck whenever he pleased; to which the other replied, "you may walk and be damn'd." The prisoner told me the fame morning, that he had got the captain's leave to go on shore when he would, to do himself justice. I advised him to let the quarrel die, or at least to defer it till they both came to England. He made light of what I faid, and turned fhort went out of the cabbin. In the evening, he came upon deck, and told one of my mates, that the captain had given him leave for a boat to carry him on shore next Next morning being Sunday, the prisoner came morning. into my cabbin before I was up, and defired me to give him a dram, which when he had taken, he went out again; and as foon as I arose, I was told, that he and the deceased were gone ashore together: in about a quarter of an hour the boat came aboard again with the dead body of the deceased, which which had feveral wounds in it, and some of them quite through. Before this difference, the prisoner and the deceafed were intimate friends, and the former had many times lent both money and necessaries to the other. The prisoner always appeared to be a man of a civil behaviour, and not in the least inclinable to quarrel; but the deceased had quite a different character. He and I had mess'd together for fome time; but I at last parted messes with him, on account of his abufive language.

the steel termschafter of the Worcefter) to wall;

William Cannon, Surgeon of the ship. Being in the master's cabbin, I heard the prisoner ask the deceased to sign the papers. He answered, that he would not fign them, for there were times and feafons for all things. The other replied, that he would not be made a property of, and that the deceafed should fign the papers and pay what he owed him, before he went out of the ship. The deceased told him, he would pay the money as foon as he had it, but would not fign the paper at all, for he was not to be huffed into it. West and reling Sanday the Mills Sanday

Soon after, as I and the deceased were walking on the quarter-deck, I faw his fervant and the prisoner, taking the prisoner's things out of the deceased's cabbin : after which the prisoner came up to us, and when he and the deceased double and reight of an about the Lucius of the country of began to repreach one another with former civilities; and among other things the deceased told him, that he was highly favoured in being allowed to walk the quarter-deck. To which the prisoner answered, "I have been admit-" ted to the company of lieutenants on board other ships, " as well as this, and have received as many favours from " them, as ever I did from you. You, indeed, are my officer " here, and insist upon privilege; but what are we when we " are ashore?" The deceased replied, " Why then I am " Charles Bignell, and you are Ned Ely." "I believe," says the prisoner, " you are like an old woman, that can do " nothing but scold."

I went afterwards to the deceased, and advised him to sign the paper; telling him, I believed the prisoner was in drink, or else he would never have used him in such a manner. To which he answered, "Drink is no excuse for rudeness—he "shall not lye in my cabbin any longer, nor will I forgive "him; for he has as good as challeng'd me—neither will "I sign the paper, for I am not to be hussed into a compliance."

About ten or eleven next morning, the deceased was walking on one side of the quarter-deck, and the prisoner on the other. I went to the prisoner and asked him, where he he lay last night. "I lay," said he, "with Mr. Weston, the "fecond lieutenant, who gave me a can of slip before we went to bed.—Mr. Bignell has ordered me off the quarter-"deck, but captain Boyle has not only ordered me on again, but has assured me, that I shall do myself justice if I have a mind to it." Then walking away, the deceased came up to me, and said, that the prisoner had challenged him before the whole quarter-deck, and told him, that if he did not do him justice, he would post him for a coward, I assured him, I was forry for it, and again begged of him to sign the paper, that the difference might be ended.

Between two and three o'clock the prisoner came to me again upon quarter deek, and protested that he would do himfelf justice, let the consequence be what it would. "Why "to-morrow is Sunday," says I, "and I hope you will "not do it then." To which he answered, "Do you take "me for a child? to-morrow is my birth-day, I shall then "be thirty years old, and perhaps it may be the day of my death; I have but one life to lose." I told him, that if I should prevail with the deceased to sign the paper, I hoped it would put an end to the matter.—""Perhaps it may, "(fays he) and perhaps it may not, it is as he will." I afterwards went to the deceased, and endeavoured to perfuade him to sign the paper, and thereby prevent the mischief chief that might otherwise ensue; "but," says he, "you " fpend your breath in vain, for it is not confisent with " my honour to fign it, because it would be to fign my-" felf a coward; nor am I to be huffed and bullied into " a compliance, my principles are as honest as any man's, " and I have no intention to wrong Mr. Ely, but to pay " him as foon as I am able, and I had figned the paper before " now, if he had not used me in such a manner; but now I will never forgive him, nor drink, nor fit in company with him." The next morning I was called up about fix o'clock, and found the deceafed lying dead on the quarter-deck; he had eighteen wounds, one of which was over the left pap, passing through the left lobe of the lungs, and coming out under the arm-pit, which I judge to be the cause of his death. The prisoner was brought on board about half an hour after, and I dreffed a wound he had received; and on Saturday the 10th of October, following, he told me, that the captain might have prevented what had happened. The prifoner was a man that behaved himself very well, and was not given to quarrel. He was intimate with, and very ferviceable to the deceafed, who used to jangle with the officers, and once he threatened to cane me when he met me on shore; but I told him, that he should not serve me as he had ferved captain Clark.

Alfanib The my han beat the best mit bewilled him gross

2011

Daniel Clark, midshipman. I heard the deceased fay to the prisoner, " What is the matter that you are so hafty to have the paper figned? I don't deny figning it, but " another time will do as well." The prisoner answered, "I will not be made a property of." And then one (but I know not which of them) challenged the other; after which the deceased said, "The boat is now hoisting out, and I'll " go ashore with you directly." But the prisoner replied, " No, you are my officer now, but if you " don't fee me, "I'll post you; for you'll talk and chatter, and that's all " you can do." In a little time, the deceased bade the prisoner go look after the sick men; and he answered, "You are not my captain "now, for captain Boyle is " come on board again." In the evening, the prisoner told Mr. Young (the mafter's first mate) that the captain had given him leave for the boat in the morning.

Andrew Wittin. The prisoner, on the 27th of September, came on the quarter-deck, went into the master's cabin, and fetched me a can of slip. He then went to the cabin-door of the deceased, and having just opened it, said something to him; and about half an hour after five the boat was lowered and manned for him. He gave his sword to the coxfwain, bid him take as much care of it as he would of his blood, and followed him into the boat, and put off directly.

The deceased came immediately to me, and asked me, who was gone ashore? I told him; and he replied, that he would be with him presently. His coxswain returned with the boat, and told the deceased, that the prisoner gave his service to him, and defired him to make haste, for it was very cold. "I may be there time enough to his cost," faid the deceased; and thereupon stept into the boat, and put off; and in a quarter of an hour the boat was brought back with Mr. Bignell lying in it dead. The boat was again ordered ashore to fetch the prisoner on board. I went in it with Mr. Weston, the second lieutenant, and when we came to the prisoner, he freely surrendered himself. He asterwards told me, that he was put upon it by a certain person, and pointed to Mr. Weston's cabin-door; who, he said, was a rogue, or else he had not done it.

James Naves, the coxswain. I was called up about five in the morning to man the boat, which I did; the prisoner came into it, and bid me put him ashore on a very small island, which the ship lay against. As soon as he was landed, he ordered me to return, and give his service to the deceased, and tell him, it was a very cold morning, and he could not wait long. When I came on board, I found the deceased walking on the quarter-deck, and delivered arts are based fiel sixt from brown should should be are and to my message to him. He replied, "I may be ashore by " and by to his forrow;" and then gave me a pair of pistols, wrapt up in red bays, to carry into the boat, which I did; he presently followed, and bid me row him to the place where the prisoner was. When we came to land, the deceased unbuttoned his waistcoat, and defired me to observe, that he was naked breasted. He ordered the boat's crew to stay in the boat, and me to follow him with the pistols. As foon as we came up to the prisoner, he shook him by the hand, and asked him, what he wanted with him? I did not hear the prisoner answer; but the deceased replied, " We shall " decide this matter prefently;" and then gave him some pistol catridges, bidding him take his choice of the pistols. Thereupon the deceased came to my right side, and the prisoner to my left, in order, as I thought, to take the pistols from me. The prisoner's sword was in his left hand in the scabbard, and the deceased stooping, though I know not upon what occasion, the prisoner drew his sword, and struck him with it two or three times on the head; upon which the deceased leaped from him to draw; but before he could do it, the prisoner run him into the belly, and the left breast, over the left pap. The deceafed having got out his fword, made two or three passes at the prisoner; but the sword faltered in his hand, and the prisoner continued pushing at him till he fell with his legs under him. This was all done in about three minutes; and then I called the boat's crew to take care of the deceased, who said, when they took hold of him, "This villain hath killed me before I drew "my sword;" so he expired immediately. That the prisoner struck the deceased over the head, and stabbed him two or three times before he could draw, that the deceased said, "The villain hath killed me before I drew my sword," and the most material particulars of the last deposition, were confirmed by John Burd, William Baker, and John Slade, they being the men, who, with the foregoing witness, James Naves, rowed the prisoner and the deceased ashore, and saw all that past.

Mr. Cannon, the furgeon, being called again, deposed, that the deceased had no wound in his belly.

will butter the tech sid of both body believed by which ethics are supplied to the supplied of a second of the supplied of

with the sub-the time do not be to one of which will don't white the last the will be the control of the control of Alternative and thereby tother inferior test menters. and decreasing and the conference

The prince of the transport of the bar the species of Second the point of the first that the control of the price of the

The Prisoner's Defence.

and bedrieff files thead advantage to the seed with the in about three unitaries; and then I called the bont's are

1. William to the first for the last on

George Weston, the second lieutenant. I heard the deceased challenge the prisoner, and tell him, if he loved fighting, he would give him enough of it; to which the prisoner answered, "No; if ever I quarrel, it shall be on the right fide " of the hedge .--- You are my officer." The prisoner asfured the captain, (when he got leave for the boat) that the deceased and himself were friends, and that he was only going ashore for his health. When I went to fetch the prisoner off from the island, he readily surrendered himself, and gave me his fword and the pistol-catridges, and told me, that the deceased had spit in his face, and called him villain. When the deceafed was at Sheerness, the prisoner lent him money to go to London with .--- The deceafed was foul-mouthed and quarrelfome; and the prisoner was very good-humoured, and hath made up feveral quarrels. It was my fword that he killed the deceased with; for, in coming up the scuttle, I bent the point of it, and gave it to the armourer to streighten, but without any view of fighting; and the armourer let the prisoner have it without my know-

George Young. The prisoner came upon the quarter-deck, told me, that he had got leave to take the boat in the morning, and defired me to call him at four o'clock. I asked him where he was going, he answered, on shore for his health; and that, when he returned, he would give me part of a bottle of wine, it being his birth-day.

Mr. Symmonds. The quarrel betwixt the prisoner and the deceased, was about a prize that was taken on the coast of Scotland, bound from Rotterdam to the Isle of Man. The captain having received a letter concerning the affair, he believed it would not be condemned as a prize. The deceased thereupon, offered to fell his share of it for two guineas, which the prisoner agreed to give him; but upon his defiring the deceased to assign it over to him, he refused, and called the prisoner all the ill names imaginable.-The deceased, was as foul-mouthed a fellow as ever God put guts into. He was very abusive to captain Boyle, to his friends, that fed and cloathed him; and, in short, to every body else. He not only borrowed the prisoner's money, but wore his shirts too; and ingratiated himself with the failors, in order to fet them against their officers. Richard Richard Chamberlain. The deceased was second lieutenant on board the Gibraltar for sixteen months; when I was first lieutenant of the same ship, there he affronted and abused me, struck and kicked me so, that I was forced to get a discharge.

Francis Davis. I heard the deceased challenge the prisoner, who answered, "I know better than to fight my superior "officer."

Richard Amstrong, the armourer. Mr. Weston brought me a sword to streighten, and I, having made a little dent in doing it, took my file to smooth it; but did not sharpen it; and that was the sword the prisoner did the fact with.

Mr. Hunt. I viewed the body of the deceased twice, and discovered about eighteen wounds, but none in the belly; that on the left breast was mortal. The prisoner had two wounds, one of which was three inches and a half deep, and the other four inches, made by a sword. If the deceased had received the wound in the breast first, I believe, he could not have stood to have received the others afterwards; but he might have made some resistance.

Mr. Jackson and Mr. Pool deposed, That the deceased had the character of a soul-mouthed, malicious, quarrelsome person; person; and they, and sour or sive other gentlemen gave a good character of the prisoner.

The court having fummed up the evidence on both fides, the jury found the prisoner guilty of the indictment, and sentence of death was pronounced accordingly.

Edward Ely was born in Bloomsbury, London. His father, being a gentleman of a considerable estate, gave him (and his other children) a genteel education, and put him apprentice to Mr. Gibson, a noted surgeon in Ludgate-street. He went to sea in quality of a surgeon's mate, while he was very young; but soon returned home, and continued in England nine or ten years. About the time of the battle of Glench-hill, when the Marquis of Huntley, and the Lord Tullibardine were in arms in Scotland, he was in one of the seven ships, that lay to oppose the rebels, and cut them off from their provisions, laid up in the garrisons on the sea-shore.

While he was under condemnation, he frequently spoke of the friendship that was betwixt himself and the deceased, before their unfortunate quarrel. He said, that he had used the lieutenant like a brother, that he lent him ten guineas, and his best linen, when he went to London, to make his application to the Lord High-admiral for preferment, and that that though they quarrelled about two guineas, yet he neve took a note of Mr. Bignell for what he lent him. That they were harrly even berate, but kept the fame company, and when on shore were a nost continually shooting or hunting together; their first acquaintance having been occasioned by fuch kind of fport, on becauched liw street to constnet

MODERATION

- His behaviour did not appear to difagree with the melancholy circumstance he lay under. He shewed a great regret for his offence: coince le lecence e (asiblido redio sid bes) apprentice to We. (Holde, a most tengoon in Led are-He complained much of a fea-faring life. He was ferious and composed, and constantly attended the public prayers, and fometimes defired the ordinary (T. Purney) to pray with him in private. A few days before the execution, he faid, he was out of love with the world, and well fatisfied to die in expectation of eternal life.

He was executed at Tyburn on Wednesday, Feb. 8. 1720, in the thirty-second year of his age. While he was under condemnation, he frequently fooke of the Trian like I that was betwint himfolf and the decealed, before their unfortunate querrel. He fidd, that he had ufod.

application to the

them off from their provident, hid up in the gairifone on the the lieutenant like agreeter, Artif le Thim ten guincas,

